Dear Robbie Williams,

I trust this message finds you well, though I must admit I am not feeling particularly Angels after receiving your latest reminder.

While I understand the necessity of follow-ups, the tone of your message has left me feeling somewhat Misunderstood. It is disheartening to receive such correspondence after a period of silence, especially when communication could have been more proactive. I expected a more professional exchange, one that did not feel like a Let Me Entertain You moment where I am constantly pushed to act under unnecessary pressure.

I would like to clarify that the payment you are referring to has already been made in its entirety as of last week (pdf attached). It seems there may have been an issue on your end in processing or acknowledging this transaction. I trust this will clear up any confusion.

That said, the proofs of the paper are totally ok. I must stress that if the article is not published immediately, the University will be forced to take legal action. This situation must be resolved without further delays, as we are now well beyond the reasonable time frame for publication.

I hope we can avoid any further Tripping over communication gaps and that we can focus on ensuring this matter is brought to a swift conclusion.

Thank you for your attention. I expect the necessary steps will be taken promptly.

Sincerely,
Pascual Chiago

Dear Pascual Chiago,

I desire the best for your well-being.

In light of your failure to respond to our previous correspondence, we are exercising our prerogative to remind you of the remaining balance and final proof approval.

I would be exceedingly grateful if you could expeditiously investigate this issue.
